Worldviews Awareness campaign

Traditional Worldview

The traditional worldview sees the universe as created by God and finds the truth and knowledge in tradition, custom, and scripture. “The traditional worldview is positioned towards the community than an individual” (Francis, 1982). People with a traditional worldview see beyond their self-interest to put other people’s interests first.

Morden worldview

“knowledge is found through empirical science, human reasoning, rationality, and logic” (Kaesler, 2023) . The universe is seen as a physical-mechanical, objective entity, and find truth and knowledge in science, rationality, and logic

Post-morden worlview

Post-modernists ”value self- expression, imagination, and openness to change” (Bentz, 1998). They are sensitive to other people’s suffering and committed to social justice and diversity. The dignity of the individual is emphasized. ”Post-modernists find truth and knowledge from their own moral compass, intuition or feeling” (DeWitt, 2017).

ONLINE WORLDVIEW TEST RESULTS

Motivation based on the Traditional, Modern and Post-Modern Worldviews

Traditional

The traditional worldview emphasizes the need to maintain long-standing customs and principles. The preservation of cultural heritage and knowledge for future generations is ensured by this reliance on tradition. It permits the passing on of knowledge, traditions, and rituals that have withstood the test of time. The traditional worldview places a high value on tradition, which aids in the preservation of cultural identity and offers stability and continuity in the face of swift societal change. Because of its emphasis on community, order, discipline, and the preservation of traditional customs and values, the traditional worldview is seen as significant and remarkable in the field of education. It promotes a sense of community, safety, and service, all of which are crucial for creating a successful learning environment. It is more common for people to accept societal roles and rules than to challenge or fight against them, emphasizing obedience and conformity. Additionally, virtues like integrity, goodness, commitment, sobriety, and discipline are valued highly. This is crucial for learner-to-learner relationships, learner-teacher relationships, and the learner as an individual in the field of education.

Modern

The modern worldview has a number of significant and remarkable characteristics in the area of education. As the fundamental method of learning, it strongly emphasizes reason, science, logic, and critical thinking¹. Modernists frequently cite secular authorities and adhere to the scientific method. They see the universe as an impersonal, physical-mechanical object, and they base their beliefs on empirical science and reason. The modern worldview promotes critical thinking, challenging dogmatic views, and questioning social conventions. As a result of the achievements of contemporary sciences, it encourages a worldview that is forward-looking and a belief in development. The modern worldview places a premium on creativity, adaptability, and technical progress. It understands the significance of training pupils for the modern world's continually changing demands. Modernists value critical thinking capabilities, problem-solving talents, and scientific literacy. They promote educational practices that encourage creativity, collaboration, and interdisciplinary learning. The modern worldview also emphasizes individual dignity and rights, supporting inclusive and egalitarian educational approaches.

Post-Modern

The postmodern worldview arose in response to the constraints of modern living, notably the sometimes oppressive emphasis on rationality and objectivity. It empowers the individual by stressing personal experience and subjective interpretation. The postmodern worldview has several essential and remarkable aspects in the sphere of education. It promotes the value of inclusion, diversity, and social justice. Postmodernists hold that knowledge is created through social interaction and that there is no such thing as objective truth. They question the notion that knowledge is neutral and objective, focusing instead on the role of power and ideology in creating knowledge¹. Postmodernists believe that creativity, imagination, and critical thinking are all important in education. They advocate for student-centered educational practices that inspire pupils to arouse their curiosity.

CAUSES, EFFECTS AND APPROACHES TO HINDER VIOLENCE IN SCHOOLS.

Socio-economic Status.

Lower socio-economic status families tend to fail in empowering their children. If a child's home environment is unstable, the child is at a greater risk of committing violent acts in school (Lee, 2019).

Alcohol Abuse.

Children who get under the influence of alcohol in school premises are most likely to take risks, get involved in fights and ultimately commit violence in schools (Lee, 2019).

Domestic Violence.

Children who are/have been abused by family members or other members of society are highly likely to become violent towards others and commit violence in schools (Lee, 2019).

Parental/Adult Involvement.

Children's social support and sense of belonging to the school may enhance if aggressive victims are connected to adult mentors in the school. A community-wide initiative to raise awareness of and stop youth violence may be successful in reducing violence.

Team-based Approach.

It is advantageous to establish a team within the institution. This team is made up of educators like teachers and administrators as well as experts like counsellors, school psychologists, and social workers (Lee, 2019). The team's goal is to train other staff members in child-focused, standardised approaches to dealing with behavioural and academic issues. For kids who they can identify as being at risk for emotional or academic issues, the team can offer monitoring and intervention techniques. In addition to acting as a link between the school and parents, they should identify and summarise research findings for their educational system.

Teaching Strategies.

It has been demonstrated that encouraging behaviour from teachers reduces school suspensions and dropout rates. Additionally, whenever possible, measures of inclusion rather than exclusion should be used when dealing with unruly students (Lee, 2019). Prior to removing the child from the classroom, try redirecting the child within the space, assigning an alternative job within the space, and using a reward system within the space to encourage good behaviour.

Understanding the Concepts of Social Justice, Diversity, and the Potential Dangers of Worldviews.

Fundamental ideas like social fairness and diversity are crucial in forming inclusive societies. The equitable distribution of resources, opportunities, and privileges ensures equality and equity for all people. This is what social justice entails. Contrarily, diversity recognises and values the distinctive qualities and viewpoints that every person brings to the table in order to foster an inclusive atmosphere where all opinions are valued and heard.

These ideas encourage peace and prosperity, but they can also be undermined by destructive and exclusive worldviews. When they are used to defend prejudice, discrimination, or the marginalisation of groups, worldviews—which are formed by individual ideas, values, and experiences—can turn dangerous.

Examples:

In Postmodernism people may feel justified in acting violently for their own personal motives if there is a full rejection of shared ideals or a conviction that there is no such thing as objective truth.

Extreme commitment to Traditional beliefs and customs may result in intolerance towards those who do not follow them, potentially producing a hostile atmosphere for marginalised people or groups.

Excessive traditionalism and a resistance to change can fuel tensions between generations or groups with opposing ideals, which could result in fights and violence.

Modernism's obsession with production and efficiency can foster a competitive environment in educational settings. The pressure students feel to fit in and uphold standards may be a factor in bullying and other acts of violence.

It's vital to remember that these problems do not stem from the worldviews themselves, but rather from misunderstandings or when they are applied excessively. It is critical to promote inclusive and safe educational environments while also fostering positive student interactions, understanding, and empathy.
